WOEFULLY SLOW!

Global markets seemed to take a breather this week as things turned slow across the board once again, not only on the shipping side but even the ship recycling side of things. Currencies fluctuated in moderate tandem, local steel plate prices made surprisingly marginal moves, all while the Baltic Exchange Dry Index slipped and oil steadied itself. The BDI reported a declining week that shaved off about 3.2% by CoB Friday, dropping to its lowest levels since early October as the Cape index took the lead shaving off over 6% of its value, while Supramaxes dipped a comparatively milder 9 points and the Panamax index remained steady for the week even though the overall index is nearly 4% down.

As inflation rose marginally in the U.S. (climbing to 3% by the end of the September), oil managed to gain some traction this week, firming to USD 62.14/barrel – a 1% climb on the back of anticipations on a possible China – U.S. trade deal, all while Trump threatens Putin with further escalations as sweeping sanctions take effect, not only on Russian oil trade (particularly with India), but even the EU now hopping on the wagon, reportedly blacklisting hundreds of container vessels this week.

And as the global dark / shadow fleets start to grow, the woeful performance of the Indian sub-continent ship recycling markets continues on and there are few emerging signs of light at the end of the tunnel (more like an oncoming freight train) for the remainder of this year. Prices have fallen so low over recent weeks that constant discussions of prices below USD 400/LDT are comfortably prevalent and it seems increasingly certain that any viable recovery has still not bought a ticket to the sub-continent recycling sector.

India has endured the roughest times over the last several weeks with levels plummeting on the back of rapidly deteriorating local steel prices and a drastically depreciating currency that continues to suffer on the back of 50% tariffs amidst the U.S. – India – Russia love triangle. Pakistan has not been too far behind the recent falls with plunging demand due to an influx of cheaper steel imports, all while Bangladesh shows moderate signs of life with a couple of local arrivals. The occasional and aggressive offerings on larger LDT units have been so sporadic, it has left ship owners and cash buyers confused as to where levels on the ground really stand. And as India celebrates a quieter time thanks to Diwali Holidays, Turkey remains seemingly absent regardless of work or play.

Overall, mounting global trade wars and tariff implementations are leaving global corporations confused and fearing the worst, should these reciprocal and seemingly ever escalatory measures continue to unfold thereby stifling shipping sectors, global trade, FX markets, steel products, and overall cost of living. For the time being, freight rates remain relatively firm, and the suffocating inflow of recycling tonnage has remained painfully thin, as we ease into the November 2025 and have little to show for yet another year of record low supply.

BANGLADESH

DEPRESSINGLY SELECTIVE!

Looking for large.

As the Chattogram ship recycling sector continues trying to balance itself on stilts in the middle of an earthquake, surprisingly decent levels have been tabled from some of the hungry / premium buyers on some of the select large(r) LDT vessels proposed into Bangladesh - capesize bulkers and Membrane type LNG carriers including some of the recent sales (mentioned below). However, the supply of those units has been transient traffic with smaller LDT vessels making up the bulk of the inward recycling rotation and is now seeing almost no interest from local buyers.

Beacon of hope.

As the economic situation remains confounded with inflation rising marginally last month, 30% tariffs on the nation's most vital exports (Readymade Garments), the Taka losing nearly 30 basis points against the Dollar this week (closing it out at BDT 122.35), and a local steel plate price that made a surprise opening at levels far higher than last week's closing, but still declining about USD 3/Ton is certainly a sign of impending times for this market.

All eyes are therefore glued to the upcoming elections that have been tentatively scheduled for February 2026 and loom like a beacon of hope (or an axe swinging on a rope) as locally, the drive to oust an ineffective interim regime that has failed to stimulate the economy via any new infrastructure / development projects since June 2024, is being attributed as the key reason behind the nation's economic decline. Notwithstanding, HKC yard upgrades have at least made decent progress with almost 20 yards now fully HKC ready, having made the relevant infrastructure upgrades to keep on the right side of the latest regulations.

Hmax sold.

On the sales front, the recycling LNG clear-out continued this week as after an agonizing wait, it has been confirmed that two 1995 built Membrane units PUTERI NILAM (26,915 LDT) and PUTERI DELIMA (26,915) have been committed on an enbloc basis to a buyer on private terms. One other sale was confirmed this week as the handymax bulk carrier from Waruna MONICA P (7,779 LDT) was fixed for a decent USD 380/LT LDT basis an 'as is' Belawan delivery, earmarking in the only sale of the week with a likely intended resale into Bangladesh.

Lottery.

Overall, dealing with Bangladesh in the present times is much like playing the lottery, until the elections seal a win.

INDIA

TIERED TRIBULATIONS!

Little Diwali joy.

Diwali holidays have come and gone without much respite or signs of stability for Alang and even the Indian market overall. It is therefore unsurprising to see any market sales being concluded to many of the 100+ ship recycling yards that remain empty, for yet another week. It must certainly be frustrating for ship recyclers in Alang to see global and even the domestic markets struggling so much, with tariffs, oil pressures, sanctions, blacklists, and even the formalization of the Hong Kong Convention that has been in force since June 26th, 2025.

Market struggles.

And despite all 100+ yards in India being HKC certified even before the HKC came into force, market driven scarcity of viable tonnage that has been stalking the ship recycling industry for years now, has left the Alang buyers with no real tonnage to work on as prices fade from the highs of USD 600/Ton down to below USD 400/Ton once again, leaving them at a greater disadvantage (as compared to the neighbouring competition) in terms of putting their HKC accreditations to use whilst competing markets are still getting up to speed.

Shadow shame.

Part of the problem has been the supply of dark / shadow vessels into India and the willingness of certain end buyers to acquire these units cheaply despite the international regulations and sanctions being in place), meaning there is now a two-tiered market that is killing prices for clean vessels being proposed.

And sanctioned vessels aren't the only price hunters while they remain under the umbrella of India's fundamentals that have been taking a brutal beating of late even though the Rupee gained a minor 20 basis points against the U.S. Dollar and end the week at INR 87.54 while local steel plate prices waddled out of the bar at sunrise with a USD 1/Ton improvement, yet leaning against the pillars of USD 389/Ton – a number far lower than the current value of ships.

Pricing apple.

Notwithstanding the widow's tales, India continues to hold on to the mantle of the safest "go to" ship recycling destination regardless of tonnage type or size, as long as you're willing to take a bite of their pricing apple.

PAKISTAN

PAYING THE PRICE!

Cheap steel influx.

Just as the Gadani market had seemingly gotten back on its feet over the last couple of weeks with fresh tonnage incoming on the back of the highest ongoing offerings in the Indian sub-continent ship recycling sector with some decent LDT dry tonnage palliating the local appetite, a sudden and recent influx of cheap Iranian scrap steel has local offerings and prevailing sentiments nosediving into the abyss this week.

Whilst not quite as low as the miserable state of the Indian market at present, Pakistani ship recyclers are becoming feverishly concerned by this recent undercutting of their local inventories and have refrained from tabling offers on any of the slim pickings of vessels that maybe making the rounds.

Refrain.

As it stands, Gadani is still positioned just above USD 400/LDT and as is the case with their Bangladeshi counterparts, Pakistani ship recyclers are looking mostly for larger LDT units (specifically dry vessels) if they are able to get their hands on any. This change in in the local flavor is primarily due to the difficulty and time needed to get provisional DASR certifications from the relevant authorities whilst HKC yards are still ongoing and upgrades taking place, thereby rendering small LDT units increasingly less favorable (for the effort needed to import them and the shorter times to recycle them).

Fundamentals too have been chocking as not only has inflation nearly doubled across September on the back of U.S. sanctions and a fresh new war with the Afghani Taliban, but the Pakistan Rupee doubled back 20 basis points this week just like their Indian counterparts and closed the week out at PKR 283.50. Local steel plate prices also resumed flatlining at USD 614/Ton, after falling over USD 15/Ton over recent weeks.

This is only adding to local frustrations as their ability to compete is being hampered by geography and the opening of Bangladesh viable tonnage of late, leaving Pakistan as the market to keep an eye out, especially if you have a dry unit opening in the area and a Gadani buyer gets up to grab a bite.

NO MARKET SALES REPORTED

TURKEY

SURREAL RIDE!

No change other than marginal steel movements and Lira down another 17 basis points against the U.S.$, wrapping up the week breaching past TRY 42, at TRY 42.08. Slow times ahead.

Breach.
